Psychology of Religion Division 36

Division 36

Division 36 of the American Psychological Association brings together researchers and practitioners who engage psychology to explore the significance of religion or spirituality in people's lives.

Our Goals

The goals of Division 36 are to encourage the development of research, theory, and practice in the psychology of religion and related areas; facilitate the dissemination of research on religious and allied issues; and integrate these findings into the broader context of psychological research, theory, and practice.

Our Members

Members work in nearly every area of psychology—from experimental psychology to clinical practice - and thus together they are concerned with both the scientific and applied aspects of the field. Our professional affiliates may be found working in sociology, anthropology, religious studies, theology, and other areas of the social sciences and humanities.

Our Memberships

The benefits of memberships in Division 36 include:

- Subscription to the Psychology of Religion and Spirituality, The official journal of APA Division 36 (Psychology of Religion)
- The quarterly Psychology of Religion Newsletter - Discounts on professional journals
- Access to an electronic mailing list that includes prominent contributors to the field
- Participation in division events at the APA convention and our Mid-Year Conference
- Opportunities for service within the division at multiple levels
- Opportunities to receive awards and small seed grants for research in the field

Becoming a Member

You may apply for membership in Division 36 at a level consistent with your status in APA. Members of APA are eligible for Division 36 membership. APA associates may apply for associate membership in the Division.

Nonmembers of APA may apply for professional affiliate status

An initial membership fee of $40.00 is due with the application. This fee also covers the first year dues for members, associates, fellows, and professional affiliate members)

Student members pay only the one-time application fee ($30) and $15 annual dues while they are student affiliates of the division.
