Psychological Science: We Have Answers

Deborah Harris O'Brien, PhD
Psi Chi President

"We are now faced with the fact that tomorrow is today. We are confronted with the fierce urgency of now . . . This is no time for apathy or complacency. This is a time for vigorous and positive action."

Martin Luther King, Jr.

Although these words were written more than 50 years ago, they apply to 2020. This has been a year of tremendous challenges for everyone. We have been forced to confront uncomfortable situations in every aspect of our lives. We have a pandemic the nature of which the world has not experienced for more than 100 years. The political turmoil of this year has been nearly unprecedented. The inequalities and injustices of America's past and present can no longer be swept under the rug. Although the racial injustices have been all too clear to people of color, Whites in the United States are starting to grasp the magnitude of the problem. Because this is an extremely stressful time, psychology is needed more than ever. For my Presidential year, I have chosen to understand why the situations we are dealing with arose and how human behavior can be changed to benefit all. Psi Chi is proud of our discipline and the knowledge it holds, and we hope to, in the words of APA President George Miller, "give psychology away" (Miller, 1969).

As the COVID-19 pandemic continues, we have all seen our lives fundamentally changed. Some of us are once again teaching and learning online instead of being physically present on our campuses. What can psychological science tell us about why this virus continues to spread? Psychology tells us that, in addition to the biological forces at work, human behavior impacts how widespread COVID-19 is among communities.
