The APA Office on Aging developed this list of resources in response to the report, The Mental Health and Substance Use Workforce for Older Adults: In Whose Hands (Institute of Medicine, 2012), that described the dire need for providers of all disciplines to address the mental and behavioral health needs of older adults.

Currently up to 8 million older adults experience mental health problems, however only one-third receive treatment. As people 65 and older are the fastest growing segment of the U.S. population, the demand for psychologists and other health care and aging providers with expertise to work with older adults will also grow.

All health professionals, not just those who specialize in work with older adults, may find these resources useful. As clients age, their needs may change and additional issues specific to mid- and late life may emerge. And, even if you do not work directly with older adults, related issues may arise when working with clients of any age (e.g., caregivers of aging parents, grandparents raising grandchildren) or impact your own family or friends.
