

PERMISSIONS ALERT FOR CPA AUTHORS

Does your paper include material borrowed from another source? If so, you must cite the original source in your paper. Because APA is the publisher of CPA Journals, if your CPA submission reproduces material from an APA or CPA publication, you do not need to request permission from either APA or CPA. If the original source was not published by APA or CPA, you must secure permission to reuse the material; for example:

1. Figures and tables—Along with directly reprinted figures and tables, this also includes figures and tables that have been adapted from or are very similar to previously published figures and tables.
2. Data—This applies only to data that are directly reproduced from another source; data that have been reconfigured/reanalyzed to produce different numbers do not require permission.
3. Test items, questionnaires, vignettes, etc.—This applies mainly to items that are from copyrighted and commercially available tests (e.g., the MMPI, the Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale, and the Stanford-Binet). Obtaining these permissions can be quite difficult and time-consuming, and a preferable alternative is to reword or paraphrase these items so as not to duplicate the exact wording.
4. Long quotations—Each copyright holder has their own definition of what is considered “fair use.” CPA and APA, for instance, allow the use of up to 500 words of CPA or APA material to be reproduced in non-CPA and non-APA publications without requiring permission. It is your responsibility to determine whether the copyright holder will require permission for long quotations.

For the items noted above, you must contact the copyright holder (usually the publisher) and request permission to reproduce the material in ALL FORMATS (CPA and APA journal articles appear online in the PsycINFO and PsycARTICLES databases). When the permissions are secured, forward the copyright holder’s letter(s) with your manuscript. Some publishers may also require that you obtain permission from the author of the original work. Permission can be secured via fax, mail, or e-mail. Many publishers have online submission forms for requesting permission that can be accessed from their Web sites (e.g., see www.apa.org/journals and click on Copyright and Permission Information to request permission to reproduce material published by CPA or APA). Start this process immediately, as many copyright holders need several weeks to process permission requests.

Your article cannot enter into production until all print and electronic permissions are secured for reproduced items and forwarded with your manuscript. For more information regarding permissions policies, see page 333 of the 5th edition of the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association.

THE FOLLOWING ITEMS IN MY ARTICLE ARE BEING REPRODUCED FROM ANOTHER SOURCE:
