When the whirling, swirling snow dusted over the windows and silenced the forest outside, Camilla knew what she wanted to do. She arranged three boxes in front of the fire, and opened her favorite collection.

Then Camilla took out the most fascinating one of all:
an ancient map of her own forest, fragile and faded and scented with time. Her whiskers quivered, her snout shivered.

“What was it like to explore, and to make the first paths?”
she whispered. “By now, everything has been explored and mapped.” Her hoof traced the outlines of buildings and roads. “It was so different here, long ago.
These paths have been lost and forgotten.”

Outside, the snow piled higher and deeper.

The next morning, Camilla awoke to a thump-thump-thump on the window.
“There’s too much snow!” said her neighbor, Parsley.
“I can’t find the path to the creek.”

“I’ll help,” Camilla said.

They tramped and tamped and trudged.
Shuffled, snuffled, and swooshed.

Until they hit a door.

“We’re back at my house!”

Parsley snorted. “How will we get anywhere? This snow could take days to melt!”

Camilla dashed inside and riffled through a box.
“We have this!” She held up a hiker’s map of the forest.

They set out again.

When a huge snowstorm
buries the paths around Camilla's forest home,
she breaks out her compass and goes on an adventure to discover her forest all over again!
