Why should I talk with my child about race and ethnicity?

Children's ideas about their own race and others' races begin forming in early childhood.
- Children learn about racial and ethnic identity from their environments;
- For young children, parents and family members are the primary sources for learning about race and ethnicity.
- Children learn about race and ethnicity through direct messages, such as conversations about race, and through indirect messages, such as the images they see around them.
- Children are learning about race and ethnicity whether they talk about them or not. Even choosing not to directly discuss race communicates your values and beliefs.

Why are books a good tool for talking to my child about race and ethnicity?

Books allow opportunities for your child to see themselves and develop their understanding of others. Culturally diverse books that are relevant to children’s lives can increase interest in reading, improve literacy skills, boost self-esteem, and help to develop a positive sense of racial and ethnic identity.
How to Choose Appropriate Books

Seek book titles that teach about racial and ethnic identity.

▪ Choose books with strong positive characters that look like your child and/or your family.
▪ Choose books that explore your family’s racial or ethnic culture, and that share traditions, activities, and important cultural stories.

Choose age-appropriate books.

▪ Picture books are ideal for children ages 5 and under. Consider books that introduce your child to diverse people, contexts, and concepts.
▪ As your child grows older, simple books with complex storylines and interactive lessons can be interesting to them.
▪ During adolescence, teens may prefer books written from a teen’s perspective or in a teen’s voice.
▪ Select books that feature characters most relevant to children’s lives.
▪ Search for culturally-relevant content that is authentic and realistic. Children gravitate to books in which they see a reflection of their own lives, experiences, and contexts.
  ▪ Books for young children should promote racial and cultural awareness. These messages should educate and empower children about their identity.
  ▪ Books for older children, pre-teens and teens should prepare them to understand racial barriers and strategies for coping with and overcoming prejudice and discrimination.
▪ Support children’s books by ethnic minority authors. Their books expose children to inclusive and authentic literature that foster an understanding of others.

Assess the quality of the books.

▪ Read the book cover and browse the pages before you check out the book. Children’s books should have a good storyline, and feature multidimensional characters living complex lives.
▪ Look for negative stereotypes in the illustrations and in the text. Watch closely for one-dimensional characters who lack depth and never seem to learn or grow.
  ▪ Common examples in popular literature are the token minority (often depicted as representative of their race), the faithful sidekick to a white protagonist, and racist caricatures of ethnic minority groups.

Create a children’s book library.

▪ Choose a bright and clean space in your home for the children’s library.
▪ Store the books where your child will be able to access them on their own time.
▪ Aim for diversity in your book collection to encourage curiosity and interest in reading. Children who have grown up with a diverse range of books will be more likely to choose diverse books on their own.
How to Use the Books

Follow the child’s lead.
- Pay close attention to what your child is telling you about the text and the illustrations. Be patient because your child may not know how to verbalize and share their feelings.
- Let their questions guide your discussion. Avoid using statements that ignore the conversation about race, such as “I don’t see color.”, “We are all equal.”, “That’s not nice to ask.” Encourage multidimensional views of others.

Prepare for what your child may ask.
- Familiarize yourself with their current knowledge about race. You may have to correct mis-information they may have learned from other adults, peers, and the media.
- Practice what you want to say in advance. Use this opportunity to gain your child’s perspective on what they may know about race.
- Acknowledge your child’s emotions, as well as your own feelings about the topics and stories. Be honest about your responses to the stories and assure your child that a range of emotions and responses are ok.

Have a discussion.
- Respect your child’s curiosity by giving them permission to talk about what they noticed in the book.
- Explore your child’s understanding of the issue depicted in the book by asking questions. Begin with “Let’s talk about that for a minute.” or “What made you notice that?”

Avoid overwhelming your child with a lot of information.
- Talk openly but with clear information. Your responses should help your child uncover their feelings and address their confusion about differences.
- Provide more in-depth conversations around issues of prejudice and discrimination as your child matures. Share information that matches their level of understanding.

Be honest with yourself and your child.
- Be aware of your own biases and prejudices. Avoid justifying stereotypes and demeaning others when interacting with your child.
- Anticipate that you may not have all the right answers. Be comfortable in expressing your gaps of knowledge (e.g. “That is a good question and I think it is a topic worthy of further exploration.”).
- Race is a complex issue, it’s okay not to have all the answers. Your knowledge gaps can show children how hard dealing with race and ethnicity issues and may offer comfort for any confusion or uneasiness your child may feel.
